

Foothills Behavioral Health Partners (FBHPartners) Tips for Parents/Care Givers Reactive Attachment Disorder (RAD)

1. Participate in your child's treatment. The family or caregiver plays an important role in treatment and its success. Be actively involved in setting goals and in the development of treatment plan for your child.
2. Care about yourself. It is important that you take care of yourself in order to care for your child. Establish a healthy lifestyle of regular exercise, good eating habits, adequate rest and participating in activities with others that you enjoy.
3. Interact with your child through activities that your child enjoys (singing, playing games, shopping , etc.) and you encourage your child to participate.
4. Develop a routine. Consistency and structure are essential to your child's success. This includes mealtime, homework time, bedtime and setting times for privileged activities such as TV, game and using the computer. Regular schedules, planning for transitions and routines will help your child feel safe and cared for.
5. Pay attention to your relationships. Caring for a child with RAD can be challenging and stressful. It is important that you support others in your family and keep your family relationships and friendships strong.
6. Practice activities that promote trust. Work with your child's therapist to assist you in choosing these activities. Your child needs your help to learn trust.
7. Discipline is important but can be a challenge, so be sure to discuss the best ways to praise and discipline your child with their treatment providers.
8. Always listen when children are ready to share their thoughts and feelings. They may open up when you least expect it.
9. Create a support network of family, friends and support groups. Ask your Care Coordinator or the Office of Consumer and Family Affairs (303-432-5955) for information about support groups in the community.
10. Learn about RAD. Ask for written materials and additional information from your providers. A few places to start are:
